Excerpt: . . . self-generating dynamic affects military and civilian organizations alike; as one sub organization responds in some fashion to changing conditions, its response creates new circumstances for fellow sub-12 organizations. As they react, new conditions affect still other parts of the encompassing organization. Taken together, the processes of invention, incremental change, and organizational response act as a positive feedback, where actions are amplified beyond those originally anticipated, designed, or desired. 13 In an effort to maintain control, both senior executives and system designers seek to constrain positive feedback, yet a self-generating dynamic of modern technological change profoundly affects the efforts of decision makers and organizations working toward qualitative improvements in military capability. Managerial efforts to impose control over innovation do not succeed. Despite heroic efforts to anticipate the pace and direction of military technology and doctrinal development (and to plan 14 accordingly), military revolutions are most clearly identified with hindsight. Indeed, philosopher of science Sir Karl R. Popper has shown that specific secondary and higher order effects of self-generating 15 technological and social change are impossible to predict. Earlier military revolutions came about in an environment in which organizations identified and corrected doctrinal errors through a years-long process of trial-and-error and incremental change. In this way, policy makers and military professionals overcame technological uncertainties inherent in the development of new weapons. Todays national security and congressional policy makers are much. . . This...
