BY PROF. P. P. CIAXTON, UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE. Professor Claxton spoke extempore, and said in substance: The high school question is now one of the most important educational topics in the South. There is but one public high school with a separate building for that purpose in North Carolina. There are probably twelve or twenty with instruction through the tenth grade, but these can not be said to be high schools. In Mississippi, with only a comparatively few white people and a large negro population, they have done much better than the other Southern States, for they have some fifty-five or sixty public high schools. The day has come when all children should have the opportunity to get a high school education. Just as our grandfathers needed to learn the rudiments of an elementary education, our children to-day, in order to keep abreast of the times, must have the elements of a high school education. As our territory expands, we are in greater need than ever before of high school training. In the early days of the nation, we were an agricultural people, with long distances between farms, but another day has come. The railroad has diminished distances and made intercourse more easy. The country has become more thickly settled and civilization has greatly advanced. With all this change has come great changes in economic conditions; competition has become fierce, and the need for advanced education becomes daily and hourly...
